The relations between antisocial personality disorder (ASPD) and smoking have received little attention, and few studies have examined these relations at the same time in terms of co-occurring psychiatric disorders. In order to examine the potential for smoking to serve as a coping strategy for problem behavior in persons with ASPD, we followed a community sample of 543 individuals, aged 25-55, for 3 years. At the time of the first interview, all participants were free of current psychiatric illness. At the second interview, 19.1% of the subjects were abstinent from smoking, 34.2% of the subjects were abstinent from smoking and present for all three interviews, and 36.7% of the subjects continued to smoke, even though they no longer met criteria for ASPD. At baseline, subjects with and without ASPD differed in the rate of abstinence from smoking; among abstainers, those with ASPD had heavier smoking histories. At the end of the follow-up period, we found that the group that continued to smoke after meeting criteria for ASPD no longer differed in the rate of abstinence from subjects with and without a history of ASPD. These results suggest that some persons with ASPD who continue to smoke may have started smoking as a way of dealing with their problems and are therefore less likely to quit smoking as the problems become more severe. These findings also imply that factors that predict abstinence from smoking are more strongly associated with ASPD in persons who have initiated a pattern of smoking and drinking when criteria for ASPD are less clearly established.
